The Mughal Empire, 1526 - 1707

Key term	Definitions
Administration	The way the empire was run, including tax collection, land distribution, and communication across the empire.
Conquest	Taking control of an area through military force.
Court	A base where the emperor rules from and is surrounded by people who serve him.
Decree	The announcement of a new decision or law that has been introduced by the emperor.
Jagir	The right to collect tax from a particular village in the empire.
Jizya	A tax paid by non-Muslims in the empire.
Mansabdar	Nobles and officials who helped the emperor to rule his lands.
Merchant	A person who trades goods across the empire.
Tolerance	The emperor allowing people to act in ways that he may not agree with, such as following a different religion.

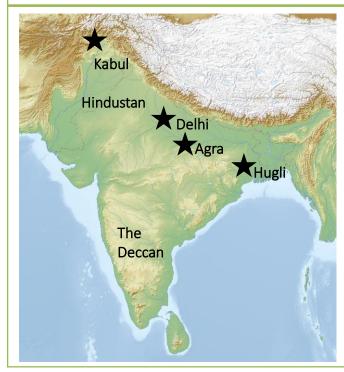

Criteria of a great Mughal emperor Military success Expansion of the empire Administration Court culture

Tolerance

Babur 1526-1530

Connections with Europe

Akbar 1556-1605

Shah Jahan 1627-1657

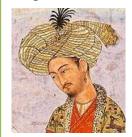

Key places in the empire

The Mughal Empire, 1526 - 1707

Babur

In 1526, Babur invaded Hindustan (northern India) and won an astonishing victory at the Battle of Panipat. Over the next four years, Babur established his control over parts of northern India, but when he died in 1630, the Mughal was small and insecure.

When he was not securing new territory, Babur established his court in Agra. He created a luxurious court culture, including a walled garden and a library of rare books.

Humayun

Humayun failed to hold on to Babur's conquests when he was driven out of India and forced to live in exile between 1540 and 1555. After Humayun lost the Battle of Kanauj in 1540, Shah Jahan became the new emperor, vastly improving the administration.

At the start of his reign, Humayun's court was based on his horoscope, but when he regained the empire from Shah Jahan, he kept the improvements made to administration.

Akbar

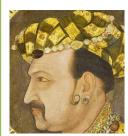

Akbar extended the empire to cover more than half of India. He established efficient administrative systems, which increased the wealth of the empire. This included the Mansabdari system, in which 200 mansabdars had administrative responsibility across the empire. This paid for his impressive courts at Agra, Fatehpur Sikri, and Lahore. Akbar was very tolerant of other religions across his empire, even abolishing the jizya.

Jahangir

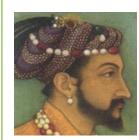

Jahangir continued his father's policy of religious tolerance, but his addiction to opium and alcohol made his an inconsistent ruler. He added limited territory to the empire. His talented wife, Nur Jahan, acted as co-sovereign by issuing royal decrees in her name.

Jahangir loved art and built gardens in Kashmir. He was slow to develop trade with Europe and many ordinary people continued to live in poverty during his reign.

Shah Jahan

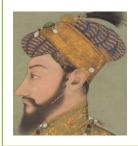

The power and wealth of the empire reached its height in Shah Jahan's reign. He improved the system of administration set up by Akbar. He had a luxurious court, evident with his Peacock Throne. He had a great interest in architecture, building the Taj Mahal and the new capital at Delhi. Through a series of battles, he extended the empire to the north and the south, including taking Hugli from the Portuguese in 1632.

Aurangzeb

Aurangzeb was a deeply religious man who avoided the drugs and alcohol that caused problems for previous emperors. He had little interest in paintings, architecture, or court culture. He was a skilled military leader who extended the empire to the south, and by the end of his rein the empire was at its largest. After 1681, he spent 26 years in the Deccan trying to defeat the Marathas. The empire weakened in his reign.